

There is a renewed urgency to address corruption risks

Corruption is harmful to societal prosperity and democracy

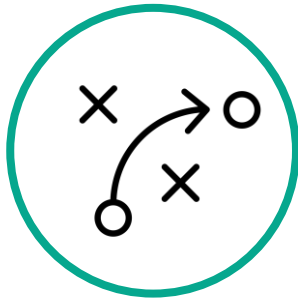

- deepens inequalities and weakens economic growth
- erodes the resilience and proper functioning of democracies
- affects the fabric of societies and lowers trust in government

A milestone in the fight against corruption based on actionable data

Governments should build on existing progress to mitigate corruption risks

Over 2/3 of OECD countries have an anti-corruption and integrity strategy

Governments still need to close the implementation gap

Regulatory measures must be accompanied by proper implementation in almost all areas of integrity frameworks

...as well as improve their data collection and monitoring efforts

What gets measured gets managed, but, for instance:

- Only 12 OECD countries collect data on whether recommendations by internal auditors are followed.
- Only 9 OECD countries, including those with mandatory cooling-off periods, track the post-employment activities of senior public office holders, making it difficult to ensure compliance with revolving door rules.

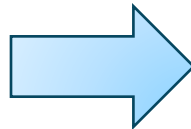

Countries must ensure their integrity frameworks can withstand emerging risks
